

if a society is to be "horizontally integrated" from in entirety, (I just caught myself: I was going to write "if a society is to be horizontally integrated" from the ground up..." but then I figured that ground-up movement is not a characteristic (or may not be) of horizontal integration, but of vertical integration) does each constituent need to be capable of comprehending (?) the entirety of that society's operations?

fractal councils: some district/area in which a cluster of 20-person councils operate democratically, and those councils each have equal footing in a district, and each district has equal footing in a "would-be state, etc.

the ~~new~~ psychic precondition for ~~communal~~ communal being.

where there is qualitative or quantitative difference, is there (necessarily) the potential for hierarchical coalescence?

What of provisional hierarchy? of rotating provisional hierarchy?

what forces of hierarchical crystallization threaten
provisional hierarchy?

what if the bottom-to-top ambition-movement of the individual could be inverted to a top-to-bottom movement? an anti-label? Instead of a constantly-crystallizing hierarchy that had to be ~~forced~~ repeatedly forced down, there would be a constantly-self-dismantling hierarchy that had to be repeated enforced? enforced by whom? By each?
